3. EDUCATION

2016. PhD. in Sociology - Collaborative option in Political Economy (accepted as submitted - recipient of a Carleton University Senate Medal). Dissertation title: Crisis of Praxis: Depoliticization and left fragmentation in Brazil

Supervisor: Dr. Justin Paulson

Department of Sociology and Anthropology. Carleton University, Ottawa, ON, Canada

This dissertation focuses on two problems in Brazilian left politics: fragmentation and depoliticization. There is consensus inside the Brazilian left regarding its fragmentation, but little analysis has been done beyond the perception of the organizations and activists involved. The same can be said about depoliticization, explained here through the phenomena of post-politics and ultra-politics, and which is arguably the mark of the difficulties the left has found to mobilize the working class even as it is under attack. This dissertation fills the gap in the literature by addressing these two problems from the Gramscian perspective of a crisis of praxis. The concept of a crisis of praxis is proposed to attend to the misalignment between theory and practice at the leftist organizational level that has led to melancholia and distance from the consciousness of the class. It is argued that without properly addressing fragmentation and depoliticization, the left will have trouble appealing to the working class, especially given the conclusions of a crisis of representation that was exposed in Brazil in June 2013.
